

THE APPEAL.

Real Estate.

FOR SALE.
A Valuable Farm

Tahlequah River.

This independent and enterprising man, a member of the Union, has 25 of acre, containing 100 acres, mostly timbered, some open land, and a fine house, well situated, having water, etc., and a stable to be had for $1,000. The property is well situated, being near a village, where a newspaper shall be printed, and a post office established. The land is well suited for cultivation, and its value is increased by the proximity of a river.

A person who is purchasing a farm in the neighborhood will find it difficult to find a better one, and I would advise him to buy it at once.

Address me at my residence, 100 Main Street, New York.

My address is 100 Main Street, New York.

I must wait with pleasure your return.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Fourth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said, "diplomacy is a life-long career. With us it is nothing of the kind. American diplomacy, compared with European diplomacy, may be described as the result of a single blow from the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure, in the outset of the United States, we have all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the people, and who had no military training, and it has so happened—probably by accident, but it has so happened—that our militia has ever since been the best organized and most efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the United States has been able to do something towards the independence of our country, which the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Fifth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Sixth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the

people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in

this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the

United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Seventh of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the

people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in

this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the

United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Eighth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the

people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in

this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the

United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Ninth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the

people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in

this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the

United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Tenth of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.

Our first military achievements were obtained by men who were sprung from among the

people, and who had no military training,

and it has so happened—probably by accident,

but it has so happened—that our militia has

ever since been the best organized and most

efficient force in Europe." [Applause.] It is in

this way, perhaps, that the diplomacy of the

United States has been able to do something

towards the independence of our country, which

the regular forces failed to do.

At the close of the dinner, Mr. Cooper said:

"I must thank you all for your attention.

Yours truly, DAVID COOPER.

The Eleventh of July in London.

On Monday evening, the members of the American Association of London celebrated the American Declaration of Independence by dining together at the Royal Hotel, and the United States consul at London, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. COOPER, Mr. Dallas, in responding to a speech, made the following allusion to recent events:

"England and on the continent?" he said,

nothing of the kind. American diplomacy,

compared with European diplomacy, may be

described as the result of a single blow from

the regular forces." [Laughter.] To be sure,

in the outset of the United States, we have

all been through such a blow.